GEN. GEORGE H. THOMAS.

had sent three sons to the army. All his children remaining at home were two little girls, Rachie and Lizzic. One of the boys had been absent from home two years, and a day was coming when all the boys were to be at home. But this long absent one, how was he to come? Gen. Thomas, that stern, but good soldier, had much to do; would he give him a furlough. No, no, said he give him a furlough. No, no, said he give him a furlough. No, no, said he give him a furlough. The father laughed to Gen. Thomas and ask him to give Bobby a furlough. The father laughed at the idea of his little girl writing. Bobby a furlough. The father laughed at the idea of his little girl writing to Gen. Thomas for a turiough for her brother, but said he'd put the letter in the office. So the child wrote, just such a letter as a child would, to the "Dear General," as she called him, stating how long "Bobby" had been away; what as letter as a child would, to the "Dear General," as she called him, stating how long "Bobby" had been away; what as plicable to the third. Here THE MIDNIGHT SUN-THE SCENERY it is in the paper (holding up a daily, and Bobby's coming home." Genera Thomas had turned aside for a moment, from the great military movements of the day, from the smoke of battle and din of war, to read that little girl's letter. His great heart was touched, and when the contents of the child-like epistle had been noted, he seated himself and wrote upon the back of the little girl's letter Bobby's furlough. Perhaps this will refresh your memory of an oft published article during the war, of "How Bobby got a Furlough." If I am not mistaken, in Chicago, among the relics of the Historical Society, may be seen this child's letter, and the granted furlough on the same sheet and in the same frame. Gen. Thomas wrote a most affectionate letter, that the daughter still retains; and now that he is gone, oh, how precious is his memory to her. Soon the mother died, and again this same one poured her grief into the ear of the great chieftain, and again brought from him words of tenderest sympathy. Such was the great and good and motherless child, and she is now one of the students of the Jacksonville Illinois Female College, with the prospect, that in due time she will be enabled to do for herself, and younger sister, what it was not in the power of earthly parents to do.

The only trees which can be admitted; there are, perhaps, a few dwarf pears (to be kept as true dwarfs), and those should be set on borders, with walks between them and the vegetable compartments. They should also be so well fed in their own borders, Of course, currants, and gooseberries, and raspberries may be set in similar situations.

Trees are misplaced, too, when placed just outside one's garden fence. If set on any other side than the north, they trees (supposing them to be apple or forest trees), they would find them ex-tending under the fence and into the garden for thirty or forty feet. They run into the garden-soil the more greedily because of its richness.

If trees must be set within ten feet of a garden fence, the soil should be removed every other year along the fenceline, and the roots cut off. It would also be well to fill up the trench with gravel or stiff clay. A better way still would be to keep the trees from thirty to forty feet away from the fence, for they would answer the purpose of windbreaks there about as well as nearer to he garden.

It is nearly impossible for flower-beds to flourish in the neighborhood of large trees. Whoever has tried the experiment has found his borders full of the fibrous roots of the trees, while his choice plants live only a miserable, sickof much size should be grown in beds devoted to flowers.

Trees are out of place, also, when they overshadow the roof of a house, or darken its windows, or shut out a fine prospect. It is the testimony of eminent physicians that no small part of the sickness of families is attributable to the shading of dwellings by overhanging trees and thick, clustering vines.
